

Alison Tang

Purification Process Development Scientist, AstraZeneca, United Kingdom

Alison is currently a purification process development scientist at AstraZeneca. Alison is responsible for developing and transferring bioprocesses to GMP production facilities. She is technical lead for multiple CMC projects including monoclonal antibodies, bispecific antibodies, fusion proteins and recently getting involved in virus purification process development. She also specialises in high throughput process development and automation. Alison graduated from University College London with an MEng and PhD in Biochemical Engineering.